Saint Evremond, less engaged in frivolous pursuits, frequently gave little lectures to the Chevalier, and by making The Memoirs of Count Grammont – Volume 02 tions upon the past, endeavoured to set him right for the present, or to instruct him for the future. Hia suppo'-hour depended upon play, and was indeed very uncertain : but his supper was always served up with the greatest elegance, by the assistance of one or two servants, who were excellent caterers and good attendants, but understood cheating still better. And for what purpose was this fine exploit, but to put yon in possession of some proofs of her affection for another, in order to give her uneasiness and confusion by reproaches and menaces, which you had no right to use?
