Our interest in physical vulnerability of parents as a triggering mechanism caused us to include a scale of functional impairment as a predictor of support flows. Clearly, economic support from each parent is, in most cases, a joint transfer from common parental assets.

This scale was designed to emphasize the measurement of the adolescent coping. This suggests a form of altruism whereby children respond over time to the age-related needs of their parents in spite of the poor quality of their earlier relationships. In addition, parents in different cultures, from different social classes, and from different ethnic groups rear their children differently.

The impact of economic hardship on black families and children: psychological authoritativeness on the part of the parent contributes to increased competence in the child, and so on.
