Be the first to write a review. Though she never subscribed to the feminism so important to her generation, when her mentors, like Robert Duncan, expressed their disappointment in the direction of her work, particularly in her political activism, she broke with them rather than submit to their criticism. In addition to her own writing and publishing, Levertov taught poetry writing. Her father Paul Levertoff was a Russian Jew whose scholarship and teaching explored the theological relationships between Judaism and Christianity. Levertov was an anti-nuclear activist and an environmentalist and strongly opposed the first Gulf War. However, Levertov appears to have chosen her mentors for what they could teach her and what she could teach . Perloff, Marjorie. The Hudson Review. Poems
