From the 18th century on, epaulettes were used in the other armies to indicate rank; the rank of an officer could be determined by whether an epaulette was worn on the left shoulder, the right shoulder or on. During the Napoleonic Wars and subsequently through the 19th century, light infantry and other specialist categories of infantry in many European armies wore cloth epaulettes with wool fringes in various colours to distinguish them from ordinary line infantry. The flag contemporaneously known as "the Continental Colors " has been referred to as the first national flag; Uniforms of the American Marines 1775-1829 Continental Navy raised the Colors as the ensign of the fledgling nation in the American War for Independence—likely with the expedient of transforming their previous British red ensigns by adding white stripes—and would use this flag until when it would form the basis for the subsequent de jure designs.
